

Increasing incidence of community-associated atypical Clostridium difficile disease in children.

Forty-one children with a variety of gastrointestinal complaints were diagnosed with Clostridium difficile infections as part of a routine screen over 3 years. The infection had not been suspected prior to the screen. Each child responded to treatment with metronidazole with resolution of their symptoms. These data suggest that community-associated C. difficile is increasing and may produce atypical disease and lead to misdiagnosis.